

SOME TYPICAL SCENES AT KALIHI DETENTION CAMP WHICH IS NOW ALMOST ABANDONED; MAY BE A MILITARY RENDEZVOUS OR AN ASYLUM IN THE FUTURE

Kalihi detention camp is the largest of all the emergency quarantine stations erected in the district of Honolulu during the epidemic of the bubonic plague, which is now supposed to be practically at an end. Over five thousand persons of all nationalities have been sheltered beneath its roof at one time, though now the numerous buildings are almost abandoned and only a few people remain within their walls.

One picture in the above illustration represents the long, segregated rows of houses wherein the hundreds of Chinatown refugees found homes after the great fire of January 20. These structures, though built in a hurry and when urgent necessity required their existence, are substantially erected, and will no doubt serve some needed end after the camp has ceased to be a quarantine institution.

A room in the Chinese quarters is also shown, where the family is engaged with the midday meal; the furnishing includes nothing beyond the bare necessities, and tidiness prevails in the apartment.

In the upper right-hand corner of the sketch is depicted a native girl in the act of washing her feet after having walked out-of-doors barefoot. Underneath can be seen a couple of Chinamen indulging in their pipes. They are so addicted to the opium habit that unless they are supplied with the drug they would not live long.

Shortly after Dr. C. B. Wood was elected president of the Board of Health, J. D. McVeigh was appointed the superintendent of the Kalihi camp.

There is a future for Kalihi camp but what it is has not yet been decided upon. The institution would serve very well as an overflow camp in connection with the Government quarantine station; it would also do for a rendezvous for United States troops on their way to the Philippines, or returning. Mr. McVeigh has suggested also that the buildings could be used as an encampment for the National Guard of Hawaii or as an asylum for people rendered homeless by fire or flood, or, in the event of the appearance here at any time of any contagious disease, as an extensive quarantine.

All these suggestions were made by Mr. McVeigh in his recent report to the Minister of the Interior, published in the Advertiser on Saturday.
